AT COLLEGE HOUR

He Gives Delightful Address on "Student Life in the Eighties."

Charlottesville, Va., November 13 .-Professor Raleigh C. Minor, of the School of Law at the University of Virginia, gave a delightful address at the November college hour in Cabell Hall this afternoon. His subject was "Student Life in the Eighties." He related many incidents of the eventful days of that period. Professor Minor referred eloquently to the state of affairs in the first decade after the war. "At the time of which I speak," he said, "the South had scarce begun to recover from the dreadful devastation of its farms and factories resulting from the great conflict between the States. Her people were poverty-stricken, her homes desolated by the red rapine of war, and desolated by the red rapine of war, and such resources as were left were taxed to the uttermost to feed, clothe and school her children, and her newly freed slaves. But war and ruthless ruin had not dimmed the fair fame of Virginia's fane of learning, nor had they ginia's fane of learning, nor had they ngirred its material presentment. True, the armies of Sheridan had passed through the Valley to Richmond, but through the valley to Richmon, but they had spared it the cruel fate that befell the Virginia Military Institute." Professor Minor contrasted some of the striking features of university life in the earlier period with customs now in vogue, and told a number of excellent stories of men and events of the bygone regime. Speaking of the honor system, he said: October 16, 1912.

The evolution of athletic activities at the university and the development of other phases of student life were discussed by Professor Minor with wit and wisdom. He ventured but one piece of advice, and that was, that the students of to-day should follow the example of their predecessors more than the students of their predecessors more than the state of of other phases of secondary with with the secondary of other phases of secondary with with and wisdom. He ventured but one secondary of the secondary of the
